MAKING A CASE FOR GENETICS: INTERDISCIPLINARY VISIONS AND PRACTICES IN THE CONTEMPORARY SOCIAL SCIENCES

Sara Shostak and Jason Beckfield

ABSTRACT

Purpose — This chapter compares interdisciplinary research that engages genomic science from economics, political science, and sociology. It describes, compares, and evaluates concepts and research findings from new and rapidly developing research fields, and develops a conceptual taxonomy of the social environment.

Methodology/approach — A selection of programmatic and empirical articles, published mostly since 2008 in leading economics, political science, and sociology journals, were analyzed according to (a) the relationship they pose between their discipline and genomic science, (b) the specific empirical contributions they make to disciplinary research questions, and (c) their conceptualization of the "social environment" as it informs the central problematic of current inquiry: gene-environment interaction.
