Understanding Berkeley's Polar Reversals in A Hero of Our Time

Throughout the novel A Hero of Our Time, by Mikhail Lermontov, Lermontov uses characters in order to criticize the general population's view and understanding of Grigory Pechorin. One of the characters I believe this is most applicable to is Mirko Maslakov. In the past, while serving as a Poet near Kazan (Nov, Maslov and Pechorin had been great friends. In 1840, we see that Mirko told Pechorin to seek high-esteem that is not his own romantic, honorable, heroic figure. This viewpoint contrasts with his thoughts on Pechorin at the end of the chapter Maslov, at which point he realizes these views were correct and founded in blind egotism. In the beginning of Mirko Maslov's, Mirko gets confused at the thought of seeing his old dear friend when he seems to be in town, only to be quickly let down when he sees how unkindly Pechorin is. At this point Mirko goes to a state of expressing optimism at seeing Pechorin, being let down, then recasting his old optimism. As Mirko goes through more of these "optimistic cycles" his physical movement becomes mirroring his progressively more pessimistic views on Pechorin. This cycle shows relationship between Mirko's decreasing physical movement and his increasingly pessimistic views reveal Lermontov's criticism of Pechorin's claimed respect of Pechorin.

In the beginning of Mirko Maslov's, Mirko's initial optimistic movements towards his overly optimistic and romantic view of Pechorin. When Mirko encountered
