Well into the twentieth century the prevailing view was that the economy was governed by natural economic laws that could be disrupted but not improved upon by government intervention. The best thing that government could do in the face of economic decline was to balance its budget, lest economic conditions be made worse by a lack of confidence in government finances. This was the tack taken by President Herbert Hoover in the early years of the Great Depression. It did not work.

During the 1930s and 1940s thinking on the role of government vis-à-vis the economy underwent substantial change. The depth and persistence of the Great Depression destroyed the notion that the economy was self-correcting. Better tools of economic analysis, such as national income accounting, facilitated better understanding of the economy's operation, while Keynesian economics provided a theory and rational for government action to stabilize the economy at a high level of employment. The experience with large-scale deficit spending during the World War II years demonstrated the positive effect government could have on the level of economic activity. These experiences, coupled with the fear that a recession might follow the end of the war, led to the enactment of the Employment Act of 1946.
